Victoria Victorious: Women and the Sport of Dogs

During her 63-year reign, Queen Victoria was closely associated with at least 15 breeds. She helped define the look of some and popularized several others. Victoria also single-handedly made it acceptable for women to exhibit dogs. In so doing, she opened the door for women to compete with men on their own terms.

In 1861 Victoria's husband and fellow dog fanatic, Prince Albert, died at age 42. The queen never stopped mourning Albert's sudden death and wore widow's weeds for her remaining 40 years. She filled an emotional void with a passion for things doggy. The imperious queen surrounded by a swirl of canine companions became a familiar sight to her subjects.

Victoria's puppy love had far-reaching implications. In an age when competitive sport for women was frowned upon, it was acceptable in Britain and America for women to compete at dog shows—mostly because Victoria said so. If the queen herself enjoyed breeding and showing dogs, who would dare call it an improper pursuit for a lady?

In the show ring, men and women have always met on a level playing field—no handicaps, no courtesies. This undoubtedly attracted many competitive women with few other outlets. Others used it as a way of finding themselves. "When I was 13, I was as tall as I am now—six-foot-two—and that's very tough on a girl," Anne Rogers Clark wrote. "Dogs were a passageway for me."

World War II was perhaps the female fancy's finest hour. Some women contributed to the war effort directly, like Short Seeley, who bred sled dogs for the K-9 corps. Others held together the home, family, and kennel while their men were at war.

Many stories typify the female spirit of the war years. One concerns Hollywood star and Great Dane fancier Lina Basquette, who in the 1930s was introduced to her biggest fan, Adolph Hitler. When he got too handsy with Basquette, the legend goes, she hauled off and kicked der Führer right in the goebbels. Surely apocryphal, but Americans wanted to believe that a petit but plucky woman could deliver this mighty blow for freedom, and so it became part of dogdom's folklore.

How frustrating it must have been for such spirited women to be denied a voice in the governing body. By 1952, more than 40 percent of AKC judges were women. Yet, in that year the all-male Delegates voted down a proposal to seat female Delegates. The motion would not carry until 1974. And when the walls of the boys' club finally came crashing down, it wasn't due to boycotts and protests. It happened simply because women had so firmly established themselves as the sport's backbone that to further deny them would be ludicrous.

To this day, dog sports remain a popular outlet for female self-expression. And it's still one of the rare sporting venues where women compete dead even against men. No doubt, that's the way Victoria would have wanted it.

What I Learned at the Dog Show

09/15/2011 by wendtworth

I spent this weekend at the Myrtle Beach Kennel Club's all-breed dog show in Florence, South Carolina. The club invited me down to talk about the threats its members are facing from the Humane Society of the United States and the rest of the animal rights movement. Since I had never been to a dog show, I said yes. (I grew up thinking that "fancy" was an adjective. Silly me.)

I'm not a big fan of people who pooh-pooh things they've never tried or seen up-close. If one of my children says she "doesn't like" something on the dinner table before taking even a tiny bite—well, let's just say that doesn't wash in my house.

And I've always thought the whole "dog show" community was rather mysterious, a kind of benevolent secret society with its own rules, customs, and vocabulary. Sorta like Deadheads, but with a lot better grooming and a lot less fleas.

Truth be told, the dog breeders I met this weekend do have their own peculiar ways of saying and doing things. But they're really just ordinary people with a shared hobby. They're really into what they do. And they taught me a lot in just a Saturday. Here's some of what I learned.

When you go to a dog show, bring your own chair. But don't be surprised if someone offers to lend you theirs. (I'm typing this in someone else's customized, embroidered lawn chair.)

Dog shows are competitive, but the people involved are remarkably supportive of their human opponents. I heard a steady stream of "congratulations!" offered to blue-ribbon holders from handlers who were trotting away empty-handed.

If you're a first-timer who asks "what kind of dog is that?" too loudly, somebody might look at you funny. These people treat their dogs like royalty. It was 90 degrees in the shade on Saturday, and the dogs had shade, electric fans, and cold water—even if their owners didn't.

Judging from this weekend, the typical show-dog handler isn't a stuffy Brit wearing Saville Row tweed. She—yes, she—is an energetic 40-year-old married mom whose husband packs up the kids and brings them along on the trip.

Sometimes the kids strut the dogs around the ring. The under-18 handlers even have their own judging category in which their skills are being judged, not the qualities of their dogs.

The name of the game is "conformation" (not "confirmation," as I used to think). Dog show breeders are trying to breed animals that "conform" to a set ideal of how a breed can look, "gait," and behave if they do everything right. (I read an article in Wired this week about how Cheetos in the factory are checked every 30 minutes against a "reference sample" from Frito-Lay headquarters, just to make sure the ideal color, texture, and crispiness is being matched. It's kinda like that, but it takes years for these folks to make a single Cheeto. And Cheetos don't pee on you.)

Watch where you step in the parking lot.

If this particular dog show is any indication of what's typical, the "dog fancy" is a lot of fun for a lot of people who contribute a lot of money to the economy—and aren't hurting anyone. "If we're not having fun here," one judge told me, very much off-the-cuff, "we shouldn't be doing this."

For the life of me, I can't figure out why the Humane Society of the United States has such a visceral hatred of everything they stand for.

I think what's going on is that HSUS, PETA, and other animal rights groups are conflating breeders whose main goal is to sell puppies with those who just happen to really love Pomeranians, Pinschers, or Poodles. This latter clique of people (far larger than the former) shows their favorite animals because they're proud of them, not because they believe it will make their next litter worth more money. It's not hard to understand HSUS's stated motivation for attacking people who breed dogs. The group wants everyone to believe that rampant pet overpopulation in America is all their fault. But personally, I just don't see it.

I didn't meet "puppy millers" this weekend. I met hobbyists, just like if I were at a model railroad convention, an antique fair, or a swim meet. They ask after each others' kids. They visit each other in the hospital. They have knitting circles where the dogs watch approvingly. They're 50 percent garden club, 50 percent church pot-luck. Zero percent animal abusers.

I asked one breeder how much money she had spent raising her champion dog, a mammoth Anatolian shepherd. "Who knows?" she answered. "I never really added it up. If you're pinching pennies you probably aren't treating the dog right." In addition to the two purebred dogs she was showing, she had "two rescue mutts at home, and they have the same food, supplements, and everything else my show dogs get."

And when I asked one of the veteran breeders how many of her peers raise dogs so they can sell the litters commercially, she looked at me like I was from Mars. "We all sell dogs, son," she told me. "But none of us make a cent doing it. And I know where all my dogs live. If anyone can't provide for them, we take 'em back." And then, almost as an afterthought: "I sure don't want any of mine going to the pound or a rescue."

Everyone I asked about this had the same kind of answer. If they found out that any of their puppies wound up in a shelter, they'd sure do something about it.

So why all the hostility from the Humane Society of the United States? Why did I hear from North and South Carolinians who had beaten back attempt after attempt from HSUS to have them taxed, registered, regulated, raided, and otherwise priced out of their hobby? What is it about these men, women, and children, so passionate about running up and down a concrete floor with their pets, that demands intervention from activists who think they know better?

Maybe it's that HSUS thinks the only way to shut down "puppy mills" is to paint every dog breeder with the same broad brush. Maybe. I haven't yet really wrapped my mind around why HSUS is opposed to everything I saw this weekend. I just know that it is.

As with pretty much every group of ranchers, dairymen, biomedical research scientists, and chicken farmers I've met, the breeders I spoke with this weekend had varying levels of awareness about the looming political threat from HSUS. Some of them can't be bothered to be bothered. Others are fired up at the mere mention of Wayne Pacelle's name.

"Somebody has to take that guy on," one 50-ish man barked when I brought up the name of HSUS's CEO. "That whole movement is nuts. After I showed up to lobby against HSUS's last North Carolina breeder tax, I started getting calls in the middle of the night, untraceable phone calls, from these people saying they were going to come on my property, take my dogs, and burn my house down. I told 'em my new rifle has an awesome night scope. That pretty much ended it."

I spoke to the crowd after the Best In Show was awarded, in this case to a fluffy pekingese named "Noelle." I told them that their problem is the same as the one faced by pork producers, egg farmers, dairymen, and even cancer researchers. But it was up to them to reach beyond their circle of friends—outside their comfort zone—if their kids and grandkids were going to keep being Junior Handlers and continue to raise the dog breeds they've come to love.

At the end of the day, I have to be skeptical of HSUS's blanket condemnation of pet breeders. I'm confident that there are some horrible ones out there, as there are with any group of people (including animal activists...), but any legislative or cultural movement that lumps the people I met this weekend in with the bad actors is just plain wrong-headed.

Because the dogs I met in South Carolina were among the best-cared-for animals I've ever seen. Anyone who's truly interested in animal welfare would want to make sure more dogs—not fewer—are treated this way. So how 'bout it, Wayne? Why aren't you promoting dog shows?

Probably because you've never been to one.

CLUB HISTORY

Thank you so much to those that attended the June general meeting! It was fun looking at pictures and chatting about "back in the day" & even poking fun at the hair and clothing styles back then!

After spending hundreds of hours working on the clubs archives since January of this year, I have overhauled my tiny dining room into a workspace that isn't at all pretty, but usable. And at times I've rearranged my sister Melonie's home office for even more usable space that's complete with a top notch printer and scanner. (Thank You Melonie!) With her help, I think that a lot of ground has been covered in a fairly short amount of time, and often with dogs sprawled out on the floor at our feet.

In the process, I have learned a great deal about the history of the club & the people who have volunteered countless hours to keep it going for all these years. (HUGE thanks to Tammy Rosencrans for her help too!!) There was a time when the club was in dire straits, struggling financially and it's low membership volume, and by all rights should have dissolved. But because the members dedication, people put their personal differences aside and re-grouped to work even harder to get the club back on its feet again. It's taken more than a few years but its officially back on its feet again and doing well thanks to those dedicated past and present members who remember why the club existed in the first place!

Former club president Michael Armstrong was quoted in a 2004 newsletter, "It's not just one person that enables success, but the ideas of many and the support of all." Something I find to be a GREAT statement that very much applies to our club!

In addition to removing all of the photos and newspaper articles from 25 or more old dilapidated albums and putting them into 10 new binders, I have added a few more items that will help complete the history of our club for the past and the future. Starting from 1965 to current.

- 1) A timeline of important events & accomplishments,
- 2) 2) a list of club officers, board & show chair,
- 3) 3) a dedicated page for members who are deceased ,
- 4) 4) and individual pages in honor of deceased members with picture and a little about them (if picture & info can be found)

Any information or help from past or present club members is very much appreciated so that the albums can be viewed as complete as possible by the Sept dog show! Please call or email Nanette (234-6292, or jorkaite1@gmail.
